Take-home Final Exam

1. (e) primer effect
2. (c) monophagous species
3. Question 3:
 - a. The graph shows the results of a study done on six related beetle species and the sex attractants they each use. According to the graph, species Eudermes pini, Phymatodes amoenus, and Cyrtophorus verrucosus share similarities in the period of time in a day when the pheromones are active despite having different pheromone compositions, although all three have 3R-ketone as a component. Most activity was noted between 2 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The species Phymatodes varius is active later than the first three mentioned, mostly at 7 in the evening. The remaining two species Phymatodes aereus and Anelaphus pumilus both have the same composition and are active at the same time of the day from 6 to 10 o'clock in the evening, with little difference in the number of individuals found at a certain time.
 - b. Although all six species have 3R-ketone as a component of their sex pheromones, the results show that there is a specificity in the composition of the sex attractants with respect to each species. Since all six beetles are part of the same insect family, the common 3R-ketone component is not surprising. Sex pheromones are also very often species-specific for the purpose of reproducing with members of the same species. The specificity may be explained due to the differences in habitat, physiology, and behaviour. For example, out of the three Phymatodes species here, two have the same pheromone composition while one has a nonan-2-one instead of 2R-Me-butanol. This may be caused due to habitat, as a higher humidity may increase the evaporation rate, which makes the substance less persistent, thus the species needs a pheromone that is heavier in molecular weight, to increase the chances of the sex attractant reaching the intended receiver. This also explains the range of time when the pheromone is active; Some of the species are found to be active longer than others, which may be due to environmental or behavioural factors. These results are biologically important in the use of pheromones to control pest populations. Getting the right pheromone composition and releasing the pheromone at the specific period of time when the beetles are active can improve the effectiveness of pheromone-based control mechanisms and avoid affecting non-target beetles.
 - c. The species Phymatodes aereus and Anelaphus pumilus have the same 3R-ketone pheromone composition and are fairly similar in the active period. The release of the pheromone from one species may trigger the other in this way, but it is likely that the two species may not due to physiological differences or live in similar environmental conditions but do not coexist in the same area.
