

Antimicrobial Susceptibility Testing (AST) According to CLSI Guidelines

Introduction:

Antimicrobial susceptibility testing (AST) is a critical procedure in clinical microbiology for determining the efficacy of antibiotics against pathogenic microorganisms. The Clinical and Laboratory Standards Institute (CLSI) provides comprehensive guidelines to standardize these tests, ensuring reliability and reproducibility across laboratories. This document will cover the essential aspects of AST according to the CLSI guidelines, including the purpose, methodology, interpretation of results, quality control, and the specific antibiotics used against Gram-positive and Gram-negative bacteria.

Purpose of AST:

The primary objective of AST is to guide clinicians in selecting the most effective antimicrobial therapy for patients with bacterial infections. This helps in:

- Predicting the success of antibiotic therapy.
- Controlling the spread of resistant strains.
- Informing local and global surveillance of antimicrobial resistance patterns.
- Supporting antibiotic stewardship programs.

Methodology:

The CLSI outlines several methods for performing AST, including disk diffusion, broth microdilution, agar dilution, and automated systems. Each method has specific protocols and criteria for use.

1. Disk Diffusion Method (Kirby-Bauer Test):

- Preparation: A standardized inoculum of the test organism is prepared, typically using the 0.5 McFarland turbidity standard.
- Inoculation: A Mueller-Hinton agar plate is uniformly inoculated with the bacterial suspension.
- Application of Disks: Antibiotic-impregnated disks are placed on the surface of the agar.
- Incubation: Plates are incubated at 35°C for 16-18 hours.
- Interpretation: The diameter of the inhibition zones around each disk is measured and compared to CLSI breakpoints to classify the organism as susceptible, intermediate, or resistant.

2. Broth Microdilution:
