

Biology Study Guide

- Both Prokaryotic and Eukaryotic cells share a plasma membrane, cytoplasm, and ribosomes.
  - Plasma Membrane: A cell membrane that surrounds the cell and regulates the passage of substance
  - Cytoplasm: The jelly-like substance that fills the cell and contains various cellular components.
  - Ribosomes: These are responsible for protein synthesis, a vital process in both cell types.
  - Genetic Material: Both types of cells have DNA as their genetic material, although organized differently.
- The major difference is that eukaryotic cells have a membrane bound nucleus and numerous membrane-bound organelles (like mitochondria), while prokaryotic cells lack these structures, have smaller, circular DNA in a region called the nucleoid, and are always unicellular. Eukaryotic cells are also generally larger and more complex.
  - Nucleus: Where DNA is Stored only in Eukaryotic cells.
  - Nucleoid: Irregularly shaped region in a prokaryotic cell which houses the cell's genetic material
  - Cell Wall: A rigid or semi rigid layer outside the plasma membrane that provides structural support, protection and shape to cells of plants, fungi, bacteria, algae, and archaea. Present in most prokaryotes, present in some Eukaryotic cells like plants, fungi, and some protists.
- Flagella are long, whip-like appendages used for cell motility in prokaryotes (like bacteria) and some eukaryotes (such as sperm and algae)
- Cilia are shorter, numerous hair-like structures found on eukaryotes, including some protozoa and the lining of the human respiratory tract
- Eukaryotic cilia and flagella share a similar internal "9+2" arrangement of microtubules, though bacterial flagella have a completely different, simple structure.
- Flagella are found in both prokaryotes and eukaryotes, but cilia are exclusively found in eukaryotes.
- Rough ER: A network of flattened, interconnected membrane-bound sacs called cisternae, studded with ribosomes on its outer surface, giving it a rough appearance. Cytosolic Access is the cisternae's internal space, or lumen, is a cavity
