

Controlling Chemical Reactions

Understanding Main Issues

Reaction types (exothermic, endothermic, spontaneous, etc.) allow you to predict if a reaction will occur.

1. How does temperature affect reaction rates? Will exothermic reactions be faster than endothermic reactions? In the graphs above, the exothermic reaction shows a higher peak temperature than the endothermic reaction.
2. Why is the activation energy higher for an endothermic reaction than for an exothermic reaction? In the graphs above, the activation energy is higher for the endothermic reaction than for the exothermic reaction.
3. Explain how temperature affects the reaction rates. In the graphs above, the exothermic reaction shows a higher peak temperature than the endothermic reaction. This means that the exothermic reaction is faster than the endothermic reaction. In the graphs above, the activation energy is higher for the endothermic reaction than for the exothermic reaction. This means that the endothermic reaction is slower than the exothermic reaction.

Building Vocabulary

Make predictions by using a thermodynamic principle.

1. Exothermic reaction is a reaction that releases heat.

2. Endothermic reaction is a reaction that absorbs heat.
