

MEDICINE 12 MARK QUESTIONS – MODEL ANSWERS

1. Explain why there was a lack of progress in the understanding of causes of disease and illness between 1250-1500.

The most important reason why there was a lack of progress in understanding the causes of disease between 1250-1500 was religious control. The Church dominated education and promoted supernatural explanations for illness. For example, the Church taught that illness was a punishment from God for sin, which encouraged treatments like prayer, fasting, and pilgrimages to shrines such as Canterbury. Additionally, dissection was banned because the Church believed the body needed to remain intact for the afterlife, which meant Galen's animal-based theories about anatomy were unquestioned. Astrology was also widely used; physicians consulted star charts to decide on treatments. This focus on spiritual and supernatural causes led to a lack of progress because it discouraged scientific investigation into natural explanations. This was the most important reason because the Church's influence ensured that supernatural ideas remained dominant, blocking the development of accurate knowledge.

The second most important reason was reliance on ancient texts. Physicians followed the ideas of Galen and Hippocrates without questioning their accuracy. For instance, Galen's "Theory of Opposites" dictated treatments like using hot substances to cure cold illnesses, but these ideas were based on limited observations. Universities prioritized memorizing Galen's texts rather than encouraging experimentation. Even when rare dissections revealed contradictions, such as Vesalius discovering that the jawbone is one bone rather than two, findings were ignored to preserve Galen's authority. This reliance on outdated ideas blocked progress because it discouraged doctors from seeking new knowledge. This was the second most important reason because adherence to traditional texts prevented exploration of innovative explanations.
