The coils are generally of two types: (a) Direct Expansion (DX) type, wherein regulated quantity of refrigerant liquid is allowed to enter through the expansion valve and the vapour get sucked by the compressor or (b) Flooded type, wherein the entire shell or large coil is flooded with refrigerant liquid by gravity from a surge drum or by pumping, the vapour from the boiling liquid move back into the surge drum and then get sucked by the compressor. The surge drum gets liquid refrigerant from a liquid receiver due to pressure difference. In flooded evaporators, the entire heat transfer surface is wetted with liquid refrigerant. Flooded evaporators tend to accumulate lubricating oil and suitable arrangements are provided to drain the oil.

Evaporators are designed to with parallel tubes to maximize heat transfer area, minimize pressure drop and also ensure adequate refrigerant velocity to facilitate return of lubricating oil back to the compressor. Formation of oil film on heat transfer surfaces can significantly reduce the heat transfer rate.

Baudelot cooler is used when water is required very close to freezing temperature, say Baudelot cooler, which comprises vertical tubes or plates, with water tricking down in film form on one side and boiling refrigerant on the other side. The water collects in a tank below.

The heat transfer in the evaporator depends on the surface area, the fluids involved, the turbulence in the fluid streams and the operating temperature and pressure. The heat transfer coefficients may range from 1500 to 5000 $\text{W/m}^2\text{K}$, depending on the evaporator design and refrigerants used.

The benefits of Plate Heat Exchangers (PHEs) over conventional shell and tube heat exchangers are smaller refrigerant volumes (5 to 20%) due to low internal holding volume, easy access for maintenance and inspection, easy augmentation of heat transfer area by addition of plates, high heat transfer coefficients resulting from the intense turbulence in the plate channels and reduced fouling tendencies and higher reliability. PHEs can be designed to have closer approach temperatures i.e. higher evaporating temperature (for same end-use temperature) to achieve higher COP. PHEs have been in use for secondary heat transfer to products (especially in food and pharmaceutical industries) for a long time. More recently, PHEs have been also used as evaporators and condensers in refrigeration systems in place of shell and tube heat exchangers.
