WHAT'S THE NEWS?

Science Current Events

As a citizen of the world and a young scientist, you have an obligation to be well-informed with current events going on in the world. Today, you're going to expand your knowledge of current scientific research and findings a little bit further. You will need an electronic device for this activity.

1. Your first task is to find a reputable news or information source for your current event article. How do you know when a source is reputable or credible?
2. Open an internet browser and Google Search "Credible Science News Sources" to get a jump-start on where/how to find sources for your current event article. (Be sure to pick one that allows free access to their articles.) Which source did you pick?
3. How do you know, based on the source's website, that it is a credible or reliable source? Provide at least 3 pieces of evidence.

This time you will read through the article for words or phrases that are new or different than what you already know. Write down at least three words you didn't know, get the definition, and then write down the definition.

After you are done reading the article, you are going to read through the article again to see if the news helped to clarify or change your opinion. Is the article about why the article is trustworthy and how it
