

CHAPTER 2

Residential Installation

Wiring: – a network of wire connecting various accessories for distribution of electrical energy from the supply board to the numerical electrical energy consuming devices such as lamps, fans, socket out lets and other domestic appliances through controlling and protective devices is known as residential wiring. As a whole there are two types of wiring. These are residential wiring and non residential (industrial) wiring. In general there are three types of circuits these are power circuit, lighting and bell circuit.

2.1 WIRING MATERIALS AND ACCESSORIES

In order to assemble properly and intelligently the great number of available electrical materials, devices, fittings, and equipment to form a complete wiring system, we must understand the basic principles regarding them.

2.1.1 WIRE AND CABLES

The term wire and cable are used more or less synonymously in house wiring. Strictly speaking, single wire, may be bare or covered with insulation is known as a wire and several wires stranded together is known as a cable. But in practice bare conductors, whether single or stranded together are termed as wire and conductors covered with insulation are termed as cables.

The necessary requirements of a cable are that it should conduct electricity efficiently, cheaply, and safely. This should neither be so small so as to have a large internal voltage drop nor be too large so as to cost too much. Its insulation should be such as to prevent leakage of current in unwanted direction and to minimize risk of fire and shock.

A cable consists of three parts:

- a. the conductor or core- the metal wire or strand of wires carrying current.
- b. the insulation or dielectric- a covering of insulation material to avoid leakage current from the conductor.
- c. the protective covering- for protection of insulation from mechanical damage.

2.1.2 CONDUCTOR MATERIALS USED IN CABLES

Copper and aluminum are the materials used as conductors in power and lighting cables.
