

Paper Example on Ecology, Evolution, and Development Essay

Introduction

Development is the process by which plants and animals evolve and grow. It's also the series of changes under which plants and organisms undergo in the stages from embryo state to maturity. In development, we find the study of the genetic cell growth, morphogenesis, and differentiation giving the procedure on how tissues, anatomy, and organs grow. Natural selection is the mechanism under which species possesses genetic adaptations to the environment. This mechanism acts differently in development (Hagan et al., 2010). It acts through individuals determining individuals that have a favorable adaptation for successful reproduction. Natural selection leads to development changes when individuals with certain behaviors have a greater reproduction rate than other individuals in population passing on their characteristics to their offspring genetically. The mechanism also determines whether a given individual will service and reproduce.

Natural selection has principles which affect development. The principles include Variation, different reproduction and survival, high population rate and also inheritance (Mayr, 1982). Inheritance is where genes of given characters are passed from individual to the offspring during evolution. This principle determines the characteristics which would be owned by different offspring from different individuals during evolution (Pace, 1998). Different reproduction and survival are whereby the selection determines the individuals who are able to survive after every reproduction. Variation outlines the differences between individual organisms or cells caused by either environmental factors or genetic differences on the pressing out of genetic capability. Natural selection determines the rate of population reproduction through prediction of species which will be reproduced as per the data of the surviving individuals.

Generally, natural selection plays a great role in development since all the development stages are studied in the natural selection mechanism. It gives clear and deeper elaborations on how the growth of every individual takes place and also the genetic transfer from the parent species to the offspring. Evaluation of survival for the individuals is also done through this mechanism hence playing the greatest role in the evolution of any species.

Development produces identical outcomes in every generation regardless of the face of ecological perturbation (Farooqi et al., 2000). This happens through a process known as mitosis whereby there is the production of daughter cells which are identical genetically to the parent. The cell reproduces its chromosomes and then breaks the identical chromosomes equally to ensure that the daughter cells have a full set each. Due to the reproduction of identical daughter cells through mitosis, the chromosomes owned are of the same number as their parent cell (Darwin, 2006). The two daughter cell are identical through two ways which are meiosis and mitosis. Meiosis results in four sex cells while mitosis results into two identical daughter cells. The two daughter cells reduce the number of twenty-three chromosomes from pair to twenty-three single chromosomes. This is because the cell reproduces itself but splits the twenty chromosomes to ensure the daughter cells have one copy of the chromosomes each. After that division, the daughter cells divide themselves into four chromosomes.
