Cardiac Conduction

The heart has its own system to generate and conduct electrical impulses that keep its major threat. This electrical system is called the cardiac conduction system. It is made up of specialized tissues and cells responsible for heart the cardiomyocytes directly to the atria and ventricles, respectively, causing them to contract. In the normal cardiac cycle, the left and right atria contract together first followed by the contraction of the ventricles together.

The cardiac conduction system is composed:

• Sinoatrial (SA) Node

• The SA node is the primary pacemaker. This node usually generates an action potential initiating the electrical impulse that will control the heart's beat.

• The AV node is also slowly firing. It is used to allow for some time for the atria to contract before the signal goes down into the ventricles.

• The Purkinje fibers

These fast-firing carry the electrical impulse to the ventricles, causing a contraction. The impulse starts at the SA node, travels down into the right bundle branch and left bundle branch, and ends in Purkinje fibers, spread throughout the ventricles.

The Heartbeat

The sinoatrial (SA) node begins the contraction by sending an impulse through both atria, causing them to contract just as the atrioventricular (AV) node. The AV node conducts the impulse, sending it into the bundle of the right and left bundle branches, and into Purkinje fibers within the ventricles causing both ventricles to contract.

An electrical impulse through the heart, cardiac muscle tissue contracts, as the cells depolarize. Depolarization is caused by a flow of ions (sodium and potassium) across the cell membrane, as the cell's and therefore cardiac muscle tissue, to contract. When the impulse first passes, the cardiac cells contract to be able to cardiomyocyte impulses. This electrical depolarization and others allow the ions move back through the cell membrane, causing the cardiomyocyte to stop. The cell will then create another from its cell electrical impulses are released. Each cell then releases another, and this is called an action potential. This electrical impulse causes the heart to contract, followed by repolarization and relaxation, at a constant rate. The normal rhythm and rate is called the sinus rhythm. The cardiac conduction system is able to speed up or slow down the number of electrical impulses depending on the amount of oxygen.
