The Montgomery Bus Boycott

But Read up. His empty seat was available when a white man boarded the bus.

All the time, Montgomery law required African Americans to give up their seat if a white person wanted it. Many lived in the South where for black people to be treated unfairly, laws also kept black and white people

A Long Road

The sudden brightness of the bedroom light caused Gloria to groan and pull the covers up over her head. Though it was difficult to get up so early when it was still dark outside, Gloria didn't prolong the inevitable. She knew her mother needed her help with breakfast and getting her mother ready and that they had a long walk ahead of them.

As the family sat at the breakfast table, Gloria's father announced the weather.

"We're going to have to carry umbrellas today. The rain isn't long," he decided.

Gloria missed the days when her mother would take her and her brother on the bus. She would get off with them near their school and then walk the last few blocks to work. Rain wasn't such an inconvenience then, and Gloria was able to sleep in an extra hour.

Now, the buses that passed them on their long walk were practically empty. Gloria, her mother walked with several other black wives, and had been doing so for other was hard to believe the boycott had to Gloria wondered if it would go on long.

Just a month or two into the boycott, Gloria's father was bombed with his wife and to Gloria often thought of Dr. King's words he addressed all those who were angry. He must meet violence with nonviolent enemies, because this movement is because God is with it. These words brought comfort when a passing driver had was terrified to beg her mother to join she felt too tired to walk.

Gloria's mother looked up at the jingling in a glass jar.

"What's that for, Edward?" she said.

"That's just for... Edward!" she said.

"Carpenter's full today because he finished his order and needs to ride. I'll take to work."

"There are getting pretty expensive some other way?" she asked gently.
